Urbanization Processes and Participation in German-Chinese Partnerships

Organized by the City of Cologne and the Stiftung Asienhaus

September 27th, 2016

1.30 p.m. – 7.00 p.m. (8.30 p.m.)

VHS-Forum, Rautenstrauch-Joest Museum, Cäcilienstraße 29-33, 50667 Köln

On 3rd of May 2012, the European Union and China have agreed on the arrangement of a so-called "urbanization partnership". On 26th of May 2013, the German Chancellor Angela Merkel and the Chinese Prime Minister Li Keqiang agreed on their bilateral urbanization partnership. On November 10th 2015, the implementation of the Sino-German partnership on urbanization was concretely decided on the basis of the common memorandum of the German Federal Ministry for Environment, Nature Conservation, Building and Nuclear Safety (BMUB) and the Chinese Ministry of Construction and Urban-Rural Development (MoHURD). This new political platform is particularly focussed on topics like sustainability, environmental and climate protection, energy, and green as well as "gray" infrastructure. Since June 2016, the implementation of the Sino-German partnership on urbanization is organized by the German Society for International Cooperation (GIZ) GmbH and managed from Beijing and a liaison office in Bonn. Until now, the partnership is only anchored exclusively intergovernmental, nevertheless it should also flesh out on the local and regional level.

China's urbanization plans are highly ambitious: In the future, nearly half of the population will live in five giant urban clusters. During the next 10 years, 250 million people are to be "urbanized." While 52% of Chinese currently live in cities, 70% are expected to do so in 2025. This puts pressure on local governments to build adequate housing and relocate the rural population, as well as to find innovative solutions for transportation and industry with respect to climate change mitigation. As Ben Barber argues, mayors of the future must become masters of "good governance."

In Germany, too, urbanization processes directly impact everyday life. They are at the center of local politics and require active citizen participation if they are to be successful and sustainable.

In this context, the symposium will give those active in politics and municipal partnerships well-founded insights into global urbanization processes, especially the highly dynamic developments in China. At the same time, it will use specific examples to explore how various forms of participation in German and Chinese cities are shaped and how they can be encouraged.

Therefore, the question of opportunities for citizen participation in its different forms, both in Germany and China, will be at the center of the symposium. The goal will be to highlight the civic dimension in the development of an urbanization partnership with China, to raise awareness of opportunities and challenges and to create impulses for the practical implementation of German-Chinese cooperation. The special focus will be the twin city partnership between Cologne and Beijing, established in 1987.

The event will take place as part of the project "China matters" (www.eu-china.net).
