A training on how to dismantle disinformation

According to the Philippine Media Monitoring Laboratory of the University of the Philippines, digital messages of fake news or disinformation spread fast on channels such as YouTube, Twitter, Facebook, and Tiktok. The amount of made-up stories is more porous than you think. This workshop gives information on how to fact check, how to communicate online and how to align yourself generally in the online sphere.

Online spaces such as social media make up or even replace many of our daily social interactions. Posting something online is more than just a click, it influences your scope of information, your mindset. Even if the information is true it triggers emotions.

With the advanced technology today, social media spaces have been used for political campaigns. The Philippines is known as the „social media capitol of the world“, an internet user spends more than ten hours online and almost half of it on social media. During the 2016 and 2022 elections social media spaces have been ‘weaponised’ for particular candidates, it can still be infiltrated and nudged in certain ways by political interlopers.

This requires deliberate and conscious action from users. The porousness of digital communities can be exploited by deliberately entering networks, blending in with that ecosystem, and then providing comment and content to raise doubts or circulate fake news. The goal is not necessarily conversion, but rather, to plant facts and ‘seeds of doubt’ that may open up critical thinking towards a more informed choice.

will be guiding us through the content.

DAKILA (nobility) - Philippine Collective for Modern Heroism is a group of artists, students and individuals committed to advocating social consciousness formation among both their industry peers and their immediate audiences.

DAKILA envisions a nation of heroes. Its mission is to build a movement that inspires heroism and nobility of thought and action to effect social transformation by collectively providing creative avenues to awaken the individual, dismantle apathy and unleash their inner hero.

The three goals of DAKILA are awareness, education, and involvement - to make the public aware of crucial concerns affecting society, to educate both the audience and, more importantly, themselves about pressing social concerns, which should effectively inform the methods of creative expression and to be consistently and dynamically involved in activities geared toward achieving the common good.
